Roundtable Synopsis

As many businesses are restructuring and taking advantage of accelerated digital opportunities, we are seeing a new kind of leadership emerge. More companies than ever are embracing the axiom that every business is a technology business, and they've also ignited a new era of exponential transformation as technology continuously reshapes industries and the human experience.

Now, as we continue with this new and evolving reality, companies must learn to master change. This asks the question of whether boards are well positioned to oversee and, in some cases, fully grasp the potential. This discussion, in collaboration with Criticaleye, will explore how Boards are taking advantage of the opportunities available to truly innovative companies, how much do board members fundamentally have to know about e.g. core technology to be an effective NED/Chair, where and how do boards update their skills and knowledge to keep pace with innovation in their areas of expertise?

Other areas to discuss include:

- How do boards keep up to date with fast paced innovative management teams?
- What does an "innovative" company Board look like?
- Reporting and communication with different sets of stakeholders
- Which countries, regions or companies are leading the way and why?

The session will be opened by Charlie Wagstaff, MD of Criticaleye, based in London and Mui Hoon Poh, representing the Singapore Institute of Directors. Michael Crompton, GM Criticaleye Asia will be the moderator.
